The Prince of Tennis, Volume 34: Synchro Takeshi Konomi

Shuichiro and Eiji are down 3-6 at tie break in their quarterfinal match against Hyotei's Ohtori and Shishido. With their backs against the wall, the Golden Pair unveil their final technique: Synchro. And then it's down to the No. 1 Singles match, with all of Seishun's hopes resting on Ryoma's shoulders as he struggles against Hyotei's captain, Keigo Atobe.

[Despite this, the Golden Pair loses when they fail to return a shot - and afterwards, they don't even remember playing the point. Unconscious tennis? Pretty sure they'd just have heat stroke. (hide spoiler)]

There's a spread where Ryoma and Keigo Atobe share crescendos of evil laughter before their deciding match begins. It killed me. For anyone keeping track (and I'm probably the only one who is) this volume treated us to: Eiji and Suichiro playing in the Synchro state; Ryoma entering the Selfless State; Keigo neutralizing it by unleashing his World of Ice (where he hits all of his shots to Ryoma's blind spots); and Ryoma digging deeper and entering the (Kunimitsu) Tezuka Zone. That's about it...except I don't want to live in a world where Keigo Atobe comes in 1st place in the Annual Valentines Day Chocolate contest, and Kunimitsu only comes in 6th.
