hello distance Daniel Wallock

Loving poetry written under a single lamp in a college dorm room.

hello
hello distance
hello horizon
hello lonesome stars
if you're out there i'm seeking know that i'm seeking know that i'm dreaming
and know that i'm searching hello distance– hello

hello distance by Daniel Wallock is a short book of poetry. I think that the author has an interesting use of language. Mr. Wallock has presented some really incredible passages and they evoke some very beautiful imagery.

I "bought" a copy of this from Amazon.com.au when it was free. These are just my honest thoughts.

I received this book through Goodreads, but just now got around to reading it. I am SO glad I did. I'm not usually an avid poetry reader, however this short book was beautiful, and it drew me in right away. I particularly love the simultaneous subtlety and force of his words. You can feel emotion seeping off the pages, and you understand some of what he is yearning for/ struggling with yet the explicit details aren't stated. I hope Daniel Wallock continues to publish his work!

I received a free copy of this book on behalf of the First Reads program in exchange for an honest review.

I have never been one to always read poetry but offered the chance I love to see the meaningful work authors can produce. Daniel Wallock's collection of poems did not disappoint, with its beautiful language and short but powerful pages. It expresses sentiments on so many things in simple phrases but they remain with you, and no two pages are the same in structure which is just as intriguing. I am no literary buff and maybe some of the messages go past me unnoticed, but the personal feel of the writing, as if they were just thoughts flowing out as they took shape in the mind, made reading this exceedingly interesting. It's a very short read, but worth the time and I can say I will be coming back to these poems. Here's one of the ones I really liked.

here i am again
here i am-
typing
breathing
waiting telling myself tomorrow will be different-
that tomorrow
i will start living

-here i am

Hello Distance was something that drew my attention with the minimalist cover and the beautiful summary. Back when I was younger, I used to always write poetry as a way to escape problems I had in my childhood, whether it be from the lack of friends, to the lack of attention from my family and my parent's fighting. My own poetry was just so depressing that I don't even want to look at it anymore. Since then, I haven't really picked up any poetry books or even did so much as look at poetry. I figured I'd give this a try. I'm glad I did... (More via website)

I got this book free through goodreads and I absolutly loved it. It was a beautiful piece.

Amanda Butler says

Daniel Wallock's collection of poetry takes the reader on a journey through abstract concepts and yearning. With beautiful imagery, Wallock ties together nature and city life through the pain of distance. Whether this distance is in destination or death, the poems' voices feel the loss of a mother and the missing love of a lover. The lack of capitalization hints at a small voice with much to mutter.

My favorite poem is a free-style haiku:

"your turquoise eyes
blink twice
first snow of winter"

This chapbook is a quick read. It would have been faster, but I found myself rereading some poems in a double-take. Wallock's wording is graceful, elegant, and simple.

This eBook is available for free on Amazon. I recommend this chapbook to anyone who wants a quick poetic fix.
