Everybody Wants an Oscar Peter S. Fischer

After six long years, Joe Bernardi's novel is at last finished and has been shipped to a major publisher. But even as he awaits news, fingers crossed for luck, things are heating up at the studio. Soon production will begin on Tennessee Williams' "The Glass Menagerie" and Jane Wyman has her sights set on a second consecutive Academy Award. Jack Warner has just signed Gertrude Lawrence for the pivotal role of Amanda and is positive that the Oscar will go to Gertie. And meanwhile, Eleanor Parker, who has gotten rave reviews for a woman's prison picture called "Caged" is sure that 1950 is her year to take home the trophy. Faced with three very talented ladies, all vying for his very best efforts, Joe is resigned to performing a monumental juggling act. Thank God he has nothing else to worry about or at least that was the case until his agent informed him that a screenplay is floating around Hollywood that is a dead ringer for his newly completed novel. Will the ladies be forced to take a back seat as Joe goes after the thief that has stolen his work, his good name and six years of his life...

Jennifer Malenius says

This is the second Hollywood Murder Mysteries book I have read and I enjoyed this one as much as the other. The characters are relatable, the mystery is a good, old-fashioned mystery. I truly like the lack of gratuitous, often unnecessary and distracting, details. A little left to the imagination is an important aspect to this story that leaves the reader wanting to read more and more. This skill is refreshing in our "give us every shocking detail and up close photos" society.

I won this book on a goodreads.com giveaway.
