From the Description:

The year is 1942 and Sgt. Harry Wilkins has been sent back from the front in disgrace. He is being sent to the coldest, most brutal and inhospitable place on the planet... the Arctic. A place where the sun only rises for a few scant hours each day and darkness reigns. A place where myth and legend are as real as the biting cold. Here, at the ends of the earth, Harry Wilkins will face an unspeakable terror that will bring him either death... or redemption.

I don't normally read graphic novels but decided to take a chance on this one when I won a copy in a goodreads giveaway. Based on an Inuit legend the story is told in the form of journal entries. The storyline grabbed me right away and made you feel as though you were there and the artwork was dark and well done. A good book even for those who don't normally get into graphic novels. A fun adventure into the unknown at the top of the world. A solid 4 stars.

This is a large hardcover book with eye-catching illustrations. The story is told with the use of journal entries; I was drawn in from the very first paragraph. The book comes across as a legend that would have been passed down from generation to generation.

I won this book in a Goodreads giveaway. It included a very nice letter saying that it took almost two years for this book to be created. I am impressed by all the hard work, and I hope the author sells a lot of copies.

An interesting read, very well paced with great visuals. Definitely worth a go.

The pictures and the story are both thrilling and suspenseful. An easy, yet fun journey the writer and artist take you on. I love this book and it will stay as part of my collection. Great job Bragi!
