Marsha says

You know how boys can be rambunctious, daring, foolishly reckless in their daily activities? There's always that one boy who climbs higher trees, jumps in the deep end of the pool, dives into a lake or performs idiotic dares. He winds up in the hospital with a broken leg or arm, gets everybody to sign it and the other boys look up to him for being such a bad mother.

Most boys grow out of that irrationality. Yeager Novak didn't. He regularly risks his life in high-risk adventures around the world. You can envy him for seeing more of the world than most people ever will. But on the other hand he acts a bit like a little boy in a big man's clothes.

Speaking of clothes, Hannah Robinson is the exact opposite. With a childhood spent shuttling from one foster home to another, she can't afford to take silly risks in the name of adventure. Naturally, Yeager sees her as being a buttoned up, plain and strait-laced homebody. But she's got the most amazing silver eyes...

With Hannah needing to get pregnant in order to claim an inheritance from a grandparent she never knew, the stage is set for the two opposites to knock boots. She could go to a sperm bank (and, surprisingly, the novel poses that route as a possibility) but she sees it as so clinical, not at all the way she wants to conceive. (She's dismissive, isn't she? Modern medicine prevents women from dying in childbirth but she doesn't like the notion of intravenous conception?) Yeager initially refuses her request that he be the sperm donor. But when a close friend dies on one of his adventures, he changes his tune. He wants something to leave behind him, a legacy, and a baby is it. Geez, that's a big burden to lay on a kid and this one isn't even a glimmer in his mother's eye yet.

Yeager has a few conditions. One is that the baby be conceived on an "epic adventure" and for him New York doesn't qualify. In fact, his prejudice against New York permeates his behavior and inner dialogue. Going out for a restaurant dinner? Seeing the sights? Grabbing a fiery snack from a vending cart? Walking in Central Park? No, that's not bold enough for Tarzan, not when he can camp near a volcano or go cage diving with sharks.

So his friend dies on an adventure and that gets him mopey and worried. Then the next moment, he's asking the future mother of his child to go rafting with him. At this point, Hannah should tell him to hit the road and go with plan B, the sperm bank. But she's hot for Yeager's muscular bod, there are all those billions at stake and she has to get pregnant in six months to claim the lucre. So what else can she do?

Of course, she learns to love adventure and he learns to prize the beauty that is urban living. I'm not sure that counts as chemistry but a willingness to compromise and allow Hannah to maintain her independence wins a reluctant three-star review.

Cat says

I always judge a book on its own terms and according to my own enjoyment level. On its own terms this is a snappily written romance, tons of fun, ridiculous in parts but saved by well written characters and a selfawareness of its genre.

Ruth says

Blush, blush, blush. I don't even have a shelf for this one. Niece gave as a gag gift and I read in hospital waiting room while BIL had a procedure. Quick read. Wouldn't normally admit to reading this fluff, but trying to reach year end goal. Not going to make it.
